

Dealing with feelings

Learning about feelings - Ideas Sheet

It is important to normalise and allow feelings to happen. We are all human and go through a variety of emotions (even in the course of a day), all of which are okay. The aim is to teach your child how to identify and express them without hurting themselves or others.

Modelling the behaviour you are hoping to teach is a great way to teach your child about their own feelings. You can identify and label your own emotions when you are getting angry or frustrated, or when you are excited or happy about something. Why not make identifying and talking about your feelings part of your everyday conversation with your child.

It can really be useful when your child reacts to something positively or negatively (and both of these are normal and okay), to help them identify the feeling they appear to be feeling. For example, is that exciting? Does that make you feel frustrated? They may say yes or no to your guess, but at least they are thinking about it.
